From the much longer Wikipedia piece (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Brill\_Building):

“The Brill Building approach—which can be extended to other publishers not based in the actual Brill Building—was one way that professionals in the music business took control of things in the time after rock and roll's first wave. In the Brill Building practice, there were no more unpredictable or rebellious singers; in fact, a specific singer in most cases could be easily replaced with another. These songs were written to order by pros who could custom fit the music and lyrics to the targeted teen audience. In a number of important ways, the Brill Building approach was a return to the way business had been done in the years before rock and roll, since it returned power to the publishers and record labels and made the performing artists themselves much less central to the music's production.”

Notes for class discussion:

Phil Spector

-First of the superstar producers.

-Egomaniac who insisted on full control of all aspects of the recording; producer, but also the creative director, writing or choosing the material, supervising the arrangements, conducting the vocalists and session musicians, and masterminding all phases of the recording process.

-De-emphasized the importance of the performers, treating them as one element among others in records.

-His signature became the "wall of sound". Doubling and tripling of instruments, multi-tracking, lush orchestration and background vocals.

-Went so far as to record Darlene Love, and then credit the recording to any of a number of groups, sending them on the road with a different lead singer. (He's a Rebel by The Crystals).

A fine example of Spector productions is You've Lost That Lovin' Feeling by the Righteous Brothers (<https://youtu.be/xEkB-VQviLI>).
